clerics who would not be silenced.

David Gitari is no unilateralist prophet, but a leader dedicated to mobilizing the whole church, especially lay people, to co-operating with other faith-based communities, especially Muslim, and to building up church and nation. Just as he has been secure in working with a whole succession of western mission-partners, even at a time when fellow church-leaders were banishing them, so Christian mission has benefited where he has been responsible. Peter Lee, as a Briton, has spent a ministry working with African congregations and clergy through the most divisive and intensely violent of times. There is enough material here for us to be assured that the practice of partnership in mission and development between three continents, despite the fallenness of human nature, can be not only mutually enriching, but redemptive.
